GOOD OLD MODERN

An Intimate Portrait of the Museum of Modern Art

by RUSSELL LYNES

our staff, at once sensitive and energetic." Barr was very evidently, as he added, "He was, I say with conviction, the most brilliant person on too late to repair the damage. McAndrew had left the Museum. departure] effect on the morale of the staff." But by that time it was he said, "profoundly angry . . . and alarmed about its [McAndrew's that it would be only a matter of time before their country would be a great deal more than peripherally involved. Belgium and the Nether-Europe was about nine months old. Most Americans believed by then brand-new bureau created in the summer of 1940 when the war in the post of Coordinator of the Office of Inter-American Affairs, a nessed by man and a foretaste of a new, all-involving brand of warfare. lands had fallen like skittles before the German blitzkrieg, and the 000 British and French troops from the harbor of Dunkirk, and their while more than 850 boats of every size and description evacuated 338,-In May the British, the French, and the Americans held their breath "saturation bombing" of Rotterdam was a horror never before wit-Pétain presently became the head of a puppet government in Vichy. hearts sank when the French Army collapsed in June and Maréchal So had Nelson Rockefeller. He had gone to Washington to assume

Eu graph trans "Charleston

of the Creole Petroleum Corporation, which had its headquarters in qualifications for the job were described as his experience as a director man" was, according to an Associated Press wire story of August 17. health and general social conditions," and that he had built a hotel in operation with the Government of Venezuela in improving education, Venezuela, the fact that he had "set the Creole company into co-"to counter the Fascist influence in Latin America." Rockefeller's profitable North American investment." For the moment, in any case, Caracas as "a test tube to show the value of Latin America as a land of American art in New York. . . . A Mexican exhibition is there now." the AP story pointed out that "he has sponsored shows of Latin he had no intention of giving up the presidency of the Museum, and Rockefeller's appointment by President Roosevelt as a "dollar-a-year > started before it was shipped and the show, of course, was canceled. had been prepared for the Jeu de Paume in Paris, but the war had which might be picked off by the torpedoes of German submarines, time. Neither were valuable works of art being committed to ships Certainly no one was sending valuable works of art to Europe at that and so an exhibition of Brancusi sculpture which had been scheduled got wind of the Mexican show from Diego Rivera, at whose house in a suburb of Mexico City he had seen photographs of what had been aswhat had been assembled for the Jeu de Paume would make an intersembled. When he got back to New York he suggested to Barr that for the Museum of Modern Art had also been canceled. McAndrew esting show for the Museum. Barr in turn told Nelson Rockefeller, who found it much to his taste and certainly in keeping with his official efsays, "saw not as much of Rivera and Dr. Medioní [who had helped to went to Mexico City, taking Dick Abbott with him, and, as McAndrew forts on behalf of "hemisphere solidarity." As a result Rockefeller grew with Cardenas' blessing (he and Nelson hit it off notably), and assemble the material] as of President Cardenas." The show "grew and soon a huge show, many times bigger than the original, was promised real reason was that Alfred feared Abbott would make enemies, and by the Mexican government." as McAndrew later learned, "Miguel Covarrubias had wired the Mufurthermore I knew Spanish." Barr's fears had not been baseless, for, Andrew says, "There was really nothing for me to do, though the seum that Dick must be recalled at once; Miguel said he could not be At Barr's insistence, McAndrew went back to Mexico City. Mc-responsible for his life."

5,000 pieces were shipped to the Museum from Mexico, and in addition more than 100 objects were borrowed for the show from the New in three freight cars and guarded by Mexican soldiers to the Texas York Museum of Natural History. The Mexican treasures were packed border. From there two Texas cowboys rode the roof of the train all nanigans of Sarah Newmeyer. McAndrew was in charge of installing the way to New York, a gesture which suggests the publicity sheartists. The catalogue was printed in both English and Spanish (partly but of colonial paintings and sculpture, folk art, and work by current the exhibition, which consisted not only of pre-Columbian sculpture Monroe Wheeler went to Mexico to supervise its production. paid for by the Mexican government and partly by the Museum); The exhibition when it arrived filled the entire Museum. More than

"It was the last time the entire Museum was devoted to a single works by some of them had been shown earlier at the Museum. The included in the show with which the new building was opened, and Siqueiros, Orozco (of Mexico), and Portinari (of Brazil) had been American show-works by Diego Rivera-though paintings by Rivera

Up to that time the Museum had held just one important Latin can Art, was in the Museum partly as the result of McAndrew's doing Mexican exhibition, whose full name was Twenty Centuries of Mexi-

During the summer of 1940 before he left the Museum, he had gone to of pre-Columbian Mexican art

Mexico for a vacation. An exhibition show," McAndrew says. "We even used the garden as a Mexican market and put a lot of the folk art there." Installing it was, moreover, one of the last examples of the carnival kind of morale that made the early days of the Museum so gratifying to those who worked there.

"The Museum was still running on morale rather than on system," McAndrew says. "The morale was terrific. George Valliant of the Museum of Natural History helped us and he would work all night, and there wasn't a girl in the place who wouldn't have cut off her left arm for him. He'd zip them off to the St. Regis [Hotel] for a drink and a sandwich and zip them back. In those days the young people would say, 'We'll sweep the floors for nothing because we want to work in right and left. Most of my department came in as volunteers. We were vator, and when things got too bad for Alfred he used to come in fire morals. It is the social center because we were right where you got off the elevator, and when things got too bad for Alfred he used to come in 100 m American Affairs and President of the Museum, so he resigned the seum as well as that of Chairman of the Board. agency) and Stephen Clark assumed the job of President of the Muthe Office of Strategic Services, General Donovan's intelligence Museum's other activities." He was not President for long. In May decade and his principal interest, as we have seen, was the Film Li-1942 he was commissioned a colonel in the Air Force (he wound up in lished statement said, "but hope to participate increasingly in all the brary. "I shall not diminish my interest in the Film Library," his pubfeller. Whitney, who was then thirty-six, had been a trustee for a tions. John Hay Whitney was elected by the board to replace Rockebought fifty-eight paintings and sculptures for the Museum's collecthe conclusion that he could not be both Coordinator of Inter-Lincoln Kirstein roamed the capitals of South America. In all, they Barr and Edgar Kaufmann went off together to Cuba and Mexico, and latter job. At about the same time he established "The Inter-American Fund" for the purchase of works of art in Latin American countries. Clark's right-hand man was John ("Dick") Abbott, who had been Five months after he had left for Washington, Rockefeller came to in Wall Street he was regarded as a "money man" and a practical operator, and so he was named the Executive Director, whose function was to keep the Museum's daily operations running smoothly and its purse plump. It was he who was also supposed to be the calm center in a storm of temperaments, and as Clark liked him and trusted him and looked upon him, it is repeatedly said, "as a sort of son," his influence in the Museum was exceedingly important for a time—a time, indeed, of troubles. Henry Allen Moe, the director of the Guggen-indeed, of troubles. Henry Allen Moe, the Museum at the behest heim Foundation, who became a trustee of the Museum at the behest of his good friend Clark (and has been an important figure in the Museum's councils for many years), remembers Abbott as "a most useful seum's councils for many years), remembers Abbott as, and he was so sensitive to the winds of change that he was a good listening device for all the board members."

S CAR

of them. "He treated the staff terribly," one says, and another: "I used ing device" that he was so heartily disliked and distrusted by so many scheming thing going on. You never knew what he was up to, and he to lie awake nights worrying about him. He was the menace of the would never answer a single memorandum except by telephone, and had a habit of insisting that you write a memorandum to him, and he the very opposite of Monroe [Wheeler]. You always felt this very Museum. Am I the only one who thought of him as a Hitler? He was it. It was a very slippery period indeed." These statements were made purposes, and he never put anything in writing, so you couldn't prove then if you would quote him, he'd say he never said that. It suited his associate curator and the director of a department, Dorothy Miller and by two of the Museum's most devoted and efficient staff members, an a perceptive office boy, says, "I thought he was very slick, and there as dull. "Abbott just wasn't very bright," she says, "and you had to be norance. Iris was the intellect in that thing." was something aggressive about him born out of a measure of igbright in that company." Jimmy Ernst, who saw him with the eye of Elodie Courter. Eliza Parkinson recalls Abbott as not so much devious It is likely that it was because he was known to the staff as a "listen-

Iris Barry (Mrs. Abbott) was not only the intellect of the family, she was also the one their colleagues enjoyed and respected. "Everyone liked Iris and didn't like Dick," Allen Porter said, and George Amberg, who was willing to give Abbott his due as an administrator, said, "He was no match for Iris, I dare say. Nobody was."

Abbott's importance in the history of the Museum is slight except as a cat's-paw for wiser and better-intentioned persons than himself.

elevated to the position of Executive Director when Mabry was dismissed, and his career was a futile one and not long-lived in (or out of) the Museum. Goodyear, it is said, "took an instant dislike to him," and so it was not until after Goodyear had turned the presidency of the Museum over to Nelson Rockefeller and Mabry had been dismissed that Abbott came into his own. Because of his experience as a broker